Winnipeg Motorhome Rentals - Many of our modern dictionaries will describe the typical caravan as living spaces inside a camper. A different meaning also used for the camper is a traveling recreational vehicle outfitted for camping whilst out on the road. Several of the original campers were utilized as the family vehicle or home base while others were used as a sort of base of operation for artists which can travel and find people who are interested to buy their crafts.

In the middle part of the 1700s, the iconic covered wagon played a really huge role in helping Europe discover and inhabit the big continent of North America. This would be an indication of developing the campers. These wagons will be skillfully designed to transport people, kitchen supplies, general equipment and offer a living space also.

In early 1800's France, the very first campers looked more like wagons and usually were used as lodging as opposed to just carting goods and individuals about. European show people, circus acts and gypsies were normally using the caravan during the 1820s and onward then again, it was just the gypsies who began living inside the campers, called 'vardos', from around the 1850's.

Although many roads were usually unpaved and undeveloped, and amenities for camping were not established yet, RV camping clubs were created all around Canada and America during the 1920s. These early kinds of motorhome were constructed mainly on the frames of trucks and occasionally cars. The first recorded motorhome within Australia was constructed during the year 1929 and it is presently housed and mostly restored within the Goolwa Museum. Both the Australian National Motor Museum and the National Museum of Australia have recognized this vehicle as being Australia's for recreational vehicle.

In South Australia during the late 20's and early 60's many railway repair crews which were toiling in far off outback places will be housed and reside in camper vans that were built by the government department. Previously, these workers would have pitched tents to live in while in places that would require them to work and live on-site. The campers had hard rubber tires on wooden wheels with ball bearings and were generally 20 feet, or about 6.1 metres. The style was that of a typical railway carriage but just a smaller.

The contemporary RV industry was developed after the automobile industry was established within the United States. Amongst these first companies, Airstream was created and is still in business now though most of them were small operations and are no longer working. In the early days of the recreational vehicle, the majority of these vehicles were shorter than thirty feet, roughly 9 metres and were therefore capable of being transported easily. However, the 1950's saw a divergence from this design and mobile homes, as they are currently called, became less mobile and much bigger. This led to the development of a different business that started to make self-contained recreational vehicles.
